Regular Vetoes and Pocket Vetoes: An Overview

Kevin R. Kosar Analyst in American National Government Government and Finance Division

Summary

The veto power vested in the President by Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution has proven to be an effective tool for the chief executive in his dealings with Congress. Since the founding of the federal government in 1789, 36 of 43 Presidents have exercised their veto authority a total of 2,552 times. Congress has overridden these vetoes on 106 occasions (4.2%). Presidents have vetoed 81 appropriations bills, and Congress has overridden 12 (14.8%) of these vetoes. This report will be updated at the beginning of each new Congress or after a veto.

Constitutional Basis and Importance

To become law, the U.S. Constitution (Article I, Section 7) provides that all bills that have been approved by both houses of Congress must be presented to the President for his approval and signature.<sup>1</sup> The President may sign a bill into law within the 10-day period (excluding Sundays) provided in the Constitution,<sup>2</sup> let it become law without his signature, or veto it. The Constitution states that, when the President vetoes a bill, "he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated." This type of action is called a "regular" or "return" veto. If, on the other hand, Congress has adjourned within the 10-day period after presentation of the bill to the President (thereby preventing the return of the bill to Congress), the President may simply withhold his signature, and the bill does not become law — a practice that has been dubbed a "pocket" veto.<sup>3</sup> The President's veto authority is among his most significant tools in legislative dealings with Congress. Illustrative of this point is the fact that Presidents have vetoed 2,552 bills since 1789; of these, Congress has overridden 106 (4.2%). Moreover, the veto also can be effective as a threat, sometimes forcing Congress to modify legislation before it is presented to the President.

This report presents information on how regular vetoes can be overridden by Congress, the number of vetoes by each President, and the use of vetoes in relation to appropriations bills. The report does not address two other types of vetoes — "line-item" vetoes (since the President has no such power at present) and "legislative" vetoes (which are wielded by Congress, not the President).<sup>4</sup> It also does not address presidential signing statements.<sup>5</sup>

Overriding a Veto

If a bill is pocket vetoed while Congress is out of session, the only way for Congress to overcome the veto is to reintroduce the legislation as a new bill, pass it through both houses, and present it to the President again for his signature. On the other hand, Congress may override a regular veto without introducing new legislation.

According to Article 1, Section 7 of the Constitution, when the President chooses not to sign a bill and instead returns it to the chamber that originated it, the chamber enters the message of the President detailing the reasons for the veto into its Journal and then proceeds "to reconsider" the bill. The Constitution is otherwise silent on how Congress should consider a vetoed bill, and it is therefore House and Senate procedures that govern the treatment of bills returned by the President.<sup>6</sup>

Passage by a two-thirds margin in both houses is required to override a veto before the end of the Congress in which the veto is received. Although the Constitution states that approval requires "two thirds of that House," congressional procedure, tradition, and judicial rulings have interpreted this requirement to mean two-thirds of those Members present and voting, provided there is a quorum present. If a two-thirds vote is successful in the originating house, that house informs the other of its decision to override the veto by message. Neither house is under any constitutional, legal, or procedural obligation to schedule an override vote. It is not unusual for Congress to make no effort to override the veto if congressional leaders do not believe they have sufficient votes.

Vetoes Exercised and Overridden

Pocket Vetoes and Returned Vetoes

Table 1 shows that, since the beginning of the federal government in 1789, 35 of 43 Presidents have exercised their veto authority on a total of 2,552 occasions. Of that number, 1,486 (58.2%) have been regular vetoes — that is, the rejected legislation was returned to the congressional house of origin, while it was in session, with a presidential message of explanation — and 1,066 (41.8%) were pocket vetoes, or rejected while Congress was adjourned. Congress has overridden 106 (7.1%) of the 1,486 regular vetoes. This percentage, though, is skewed downward slightly by the enormous number of vetoes in administrations prior to the 87th Congress (which began in 1961). If one counts only the vetoes since 1961 (the beginning of the Kennedy Administration), one finds 352 vetoes and 33 overridden (9.4%).

George W. Bush was the first President since John Quincy Adams (1825-1829) to serve a full term without wielding his veto. No president since Thomas Jefferson (1801-1809) has served two terms without vetoing a bill. During his second term in office, President Bush vetoed H.R. 10, the Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act of 2005, on July 19, 2006; and H.R. 1591, the U.S. Troop Readiness, Veterans' Care, Katrina Recovery, and Iraq Accountability Appropriations Act, 2007, on May 1, 2007.

&lt;sup>8</sup> Most of those vetoes prior to 1960 were of private bills (i.e., legislation that would confer benefits upon a single person or company) which were almost never overridden. In 1971, Congress gave administrators more discretion to handle the claims of individuals. Thus, the need for congressionally passed private bills has dropped dramatically — from hundreds per annum to a few dozen — and, therefore, the opportunities for vetoes. On private bills, see CRS Report 98-628, Private Bills: Procedure in the House, by Richard S. Beth.

Vetoes of Appropriation Bills

A veto of an appropriations bill can result in the closure of federal agencies, the furlough of federal employees, and the interruption of federal programs and services. Despite these high stakes, Presidents have vetoed many appropriation bills. For example, Presidents Carter, Reagan, George H. W. Bush, and Clinton were presented with a total of 387 annual appropriations acts and vetoed 30 of them (7.8%). President George W. Bush has vetoed one appropriation bill. Congressional overrides of vetoes of appropriations are also not unusual. For example, of the 81 vetoes of appropriations since 1789, 12 (14.8%) were overridden (see Table 2). Interestingly, more than half of the vetoes of appropriations bills have occurred since 1968.
