Presidential Transitions

Summary

Since President George Washington first relinquished his office to incoming President John Adams in 1797, this peaceful transition, symbolizing both continuity and change, has demonstrated the stability of our system of government. Aside from the symbolic transfer of power, an orderly transition from the outgoing Administration to the incoming Administration is essential to ensure continuity in the working affairs of government. Necessary funding for both the incoming and outgoing Administrations is authorized by the Presidential Transition Act, as amended. The General Services Administration (GSA) is authorized to provide suitable office space, staff compensation, communications services, and printing and postage costs associated with the transition. For the last presidential transition, GSA was authorized a total of $7.1 million in FY2001: $1.83 million for the outgoing William Clinton Administration; $4.27 million for the incoming Administration of George W. Bush; and $1 million for GSA to provide additional assistance as required by law.

In order to provide federal funding in the event of a 2004-2005 presidential transition, the President's FY2005 budget proposal requested a total of $7.7 million. It also proposed to amend the PTA to permit the expenditure of not more than $1 million for training and briefings for incoming appointees associated with the second term of an incumbent President. The House passed H.R. 5025, the FY2005 Transportation, Treasury, and Independent Agencies appropriations bill, on September 22, 2004. The legislation recommended for GSA a total of $7.7 million for transition expenses, and recommended that, if no transition occurred, $1 million be used by the incumbent President for briefings of incoming personnel associated with a second term. In the Senate, S. 2806 also recommended a total of $7.7 million to implement a possible transition. However, the Senate Committee on Appropriations denied the request to allow $1 million for training for incoming appointees associated with the second term of an incumbent President, stating that "it should be properly budgeted for and requested by the appropriate agencies." P.L. 108-309 was enacted on September 30, 2004, to provide continuing non-defense appropriations through November 20, 2004. A total of $2.5 million was authorized in the event of a presidential transition, until enactment of the FY2005 omnibus appropriations bill. Due to the outcome of the 2004 presidential election, no funds were provided in P.L. 108-447, the FY2005 Consolidated Appropriations Act.

The President's FY2009 budget requests $8,520,000 in funding for the upcoming presidential transition.

Part I of this report discusses legislative actions to enhance the transition process, each transition since 1960, and general considerations for the presidential transition process. Presidential Transitions

Introduction

Since outgoing President George Washington first relinquished his office to incoming President John Adams in 1797, this peaceful transition, symbolizing both continuity and change, has demonstrated the “best of American democracy to the world.”¹ The activities surrounding a presidential transition today begin shortly after the election, as the President-elect has fewer than 11 weeks to formulate the new Administration before taking the oath of office on January 20. A formal transition process has been shown to be essential to ensure continuity in the conduct of the affairs of the executive branch, as well as the rest of the federal government.

Before 1963, the primary source of funding for transition expenses was the political party organization of the incoming President, and the efforts of volunteer staff. Realizing the importance of presidential transitions for effective government, Congress first enacted the Presidential Transition Act of 1963 (PTA) to authorize federal funding and assistance for future incoming Administrations.² The act was amended by Congress in 1976, to increase the authorization for a presidential transition to $3 million, with $2 million available to the President-elect and Vice President-elect and $1 million to the outgoing President and Vice President.³

In 1988, Congress enacted the Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act to increase federal funding to $5 million to support a change of Administrations.⁴ Of this total, $3.5 million was authorized to be appropriated for services and facilities to the President-elect and Vice President-elect. The outgoing President and Vice President were authorized $1.5 million in federal funds. A total of $250,000 would be returned to the Treasury if the outgoing Vice President were subsequently elected President. These funds were authorized to be increased in future transitions to accommodate inflation. The new legislation also amended the PTA to require that private contributions and names of transition personnel be publicly disclosed.

In anticipation of the 2000-2001 transition, the 106th Congress enacted P.L. 106-293, the Presidential Transition Act of 2000, which President Clinton signed on October 13, 2000.⁵ It amended the PTA to authorize the General Services Administration (GSA) to provide additional support in the orientation of the President-elect's newly appointed senior staff.

Part I of this report discusses legislative actions to enhance the transition process, each transition since the 1960-1961 arrival of President John F. Kennedy, and general considerations for the presidential transition process. Part II contains the text of the major transition statutes discussed in the report.

President's Commission on Campaign Costs

Subsequent to the 1960 election, it was widely recognized that changes were needed in campaign finance practices. Funding for presidential transition activities was among the issues discussed. Accordingly, on November 8, 1961, President Kennedy established the President's Commission on Campaign Costs to make recommendations on "improved ways of financing expenditures required of nominees for the offices of President and Vice President" as well as other relevant costs associated with presidential campaigns.⁶ Five months later, the 12-member bipartisan commission completed its final report, entitled Financing Presidential Campaigns, which included a recommendation on presidential transitions.⁷

The commission reported that the 1952-1953 transition for President Dwight D. Eisenhower cost a special Republican committee more than $200,000, and the 1960-1961 transition for President Kennedy cost $360,000, funded by the Democratic National Committee. Noting that such expenses created financial hardship for the political parties, especially after an election, the commission recommended that funding for the President-elect and Vice President-elect should not be the responsibility of a political party.

We endorse proposals to "institutionalize" the transition from one administration to another when the party in power changes. Important reasons for doing so exist wholly aside from the costs to the parties. The new President must select and assemble the staff to man his administration, and they in return must prepare themselves for their new responsibilities.⁸

The commission also recommended that the outgoing President be authorized to receive federally funded facilities and services to assist in the orderly transfer of executive power.⁹

In a May 29, 1962, letter to Congress transmitting legislation to implement the commission's final recommendations, President Kennedy stated:

Traditionally, the political parties have had to pay the costs of the President-elect and Vice President-elect during the transition period between the election and the inauguration of a new Administration. It is entirely desirable and appropriate that the Federal government provide funds for paying the reasonable and necessary costs of installing a new Administration in office.¹⁰

In addition to the importance of federal funding, President Kennedy stressed that an incoming President must select "responsible public officials who must prepare themselves for their new responsibilities" during the transition period.

The Presidential Transition Act of 1963

As recommended by the President's Commission on Campaign Costs, legislation was introduced during the 87th Congress to provide federal financial support for presidential transitions. Although it was supported by President Kennedy, there was no action on the bill. During the following Congress, H.R. 4638, the Presidential Transition Act of 1963 (PTA), was introduced on April 24, 1963, and was enacted on March 7, 1964, as P.L. 88-277.¹¹

The PTA authorized the Administrator of General Services to provide to the President-elect and Vice President-elect office space, compensation to office staff, the detail of personnel on a reimbursable or non-reimbursable basis from federal agencies, the hiring of consultants, and travel expenses. It also authorized the provision of such services to the outgoing President and Vice President, for a period not to exceed six months from the expiration of their terms of office. The act authorized the appropriation of $900,000 for each presidential transition, but did not specify how the amount was to be divided between the incoming and outgoing Administrations. However, the legislative history indicated that the funds were to be divided equally.¹²

Funding Under the Presidential Transition Act

Even though the PTA was enacted in 1964, its provisions were not fully applied following President Johnson's reelection in 1964, since he was already in office. Vice President-elect Hubert Humphrey spent approximately $72,000 in transition expenses under the act.¹³

Johnson-Nixon Transition. The PTA was first fully implemented during the transition from the Administration of President Johnson to that of President Richard Nixon in 1968-1969, when the transition funds were divided equally between the two Administrations. The following year, the General Accounting Office (GAO) reviewed the operation of the act. GAO found that President Nixon incurred transition costs of $1.5 million, and it recommended that the $900,000 limit be increased to better reflect actual transition expenses.¹⁴ A 1982 GAO report stated that President-elect Nixon raised $1 million in private funds to supplement the $450,000 available to him under the act.¹⁵

President Johnson spent $370,276 of the $375,000 allocated to him under the PTA.¹⁶ He also had the assistance of employees provided by federal agencies on a nonreimbursable basis.¹⁷ Vice President Humphrey spent $75,000 to pay the salaries and expenses of his staff and consultants.¹⁸

Nixon-Ford Transition. In 1974, Vice President Gerald Ford faced a situation entirely different from that of the first presidential transition covered by the PTA. Because of the resignation of President Nixon, Mr. Ford was not a President-elect, and he received no funds under the Presidential Transition Act.¹⁹

Due to the manner in which President Nixon left office, there was some debate as to whether he was entitled to allowances and services as a former President. The Justice Department ruled that he was entitled to federal funds as a former President, since he had not been removed by impeachment.²⁰ Funds are appropriated under the Presidential Transition Act only for presidential election years; therefore, no funds were specifically available when President Nixon left office. On August 29, 1974, the Ford Administration requested Congress to appropriate $450,000 to GSA for carrying out the provisions of the act. The Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1975 appropriated $100,000 to President Nixon under the Presidential Transition Act for a period of six months ending February 9, 1975.²¹ In addition, most of the clerical and staff work was done by detailed employees provided by several federal agencies, on a nonreimbursable basis.²²

Ford-Carter Transition. Based on earlier GAO recommendations, the Presidential Transition Act was amended by Congress in 1976 to increase the authorization for a presidential transition to $3 million, with $2 million available to the President-elect and Vice President-elect and $1 million to the outgoing President and Vice President.²³ The act also amended the earlier legislation to authorize the detail of personnel, on a reimbursable basis only.

The increase in funding was first made available to President Ford and President Jimmy Carter in the 1976-1977 transition. The incoming Carter-Mondale Administration spent approximately $1.7 million of the $2 million made available to it pursuant to the act, without any reported private additional assistance.²⁴

Of the $1 million appropriated to the outgoing Ford Administration, President Ford was allocated $905,000, and $95,000 went to Vice President Nelson Rockefeller. As of August 31, 1977, former President Ford had spent approximately $635,000 of the total appropriation, but GAO found that an additional amount would be needed to pay for the use of military aircraft.²⁵

At the end of the six-month transition period, Vice President Rockefeller had used $51,292 of the total funds available to him under the PTA, as amended.²⁶

Carter-Reagan Transition. During the 1980-1981 transition, President Carter spent $672,659 for transition purposes, and Vice President Walter Mondale used $188,867 of the $1 million available to the outgoing Carter Administration.²⁷

The incoming Administration of Ronald Reagan spent approximately $1.75 million of the $2 million in available transition funds. Of this total, $63,378 went to Vice President-elect George H. W. Bush for personnel compensation and benefits.²⁸

A 1982 GAO review of the Reagan-Bush transition team's activities at six federal agencies found that approximately $235,000 in transition-related expenses were charged to the agencies' general appropriations. According to GAO, most of the expenses were incurred for gathering and communicating information about agency operations to the transition team. However, certain expenses were related to salaries for secretarial employees who were assigned to the transition team on a nonreimbursable basis and who worked at the team's direction on a full-time or nearly full-time basis. Since the PTA authorized that agency employee details to the transition team be made on a reimbursable basis only, GAO found that the transition team did not always follow correct procedures.²⁹

In addition to federal appropriations, funds for the Reagan transition were solicited from the public by the Presidential Transition Foundation, Inc., a private corporation. GAO attempted to audit these funds, but was denied access to the accounts and records by the foundation's legal counsel. According to GAO's report, the foundation stated that it would be audited by a public accounting firm. GAO found that federal funds appropriated under the PTA were kept separate from private funds donated to the foundation.³⁰ A 1988 Senate report stated that, based on Internal Revenue Service documents and Federal Election Commission reports:

President-elect Reagan raised approximately $1.25 million for both his pre-election and post-election transition activities in 1980. None of the sources or expenditures associated with the private cash were ever disclosed to the public, creating the potential for hidden conflicts of interest.³¹

Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act

In anticipation of a new President being elected in the November 1988 general election, the 100th Congress began consideration of legislation to provide increased federal funding for the 1988-1989 transition. After examining the transition expenditures for previous incoming Presidents Carter and Reagan, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs expressed concern that future incoming Presidents would have to raise private funds to finance their transitions if the funding under the PTA were not increased.³²

Prior to the enactment of the PTA, and subsequently, many candidates had initiated transition activities and studies before the election, in some cases before the convention. The committee affirmed that pre-election transition planning is a legitimate cost of a presidential transition and concluded that such planning should be covered, at least partially, by public funds. However, the Federal Elections Commission indicated that there were regulatory prohibitions:

[I]t appears that, under current law and regulations, the FEC would find that federal campaign funds — as opposed to segregated private donations — are not available for transition funding during a campaign. Furthermore, we are aware of no FEC reporting or disclosure requirements applicable to private transition funds.³³

As reported, the Senate bill provided for limited public funding of pre-election transition planning. Those provisions were not enacted. It continues to be the practice that all pre-election transition planning is privately financed.

As a result of these deliberations, Congress enacted the Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act to increase federal funding for presidential transitions and to amend the 1964 legislation to require that private contributions and names of transition personnel be publicly disclosed (see Part II for complete text).³⁴

The act authorized $3.5 million to be appropriated for the funding of services and facilities to the President-elect and Vice President-elect. The outgoing President and Vice President were authorized $1.5 million in federal funds. In the event the outgoing Vice President were subsequently elected President, the new Administration would receive only $1.25 million in assistance. For future transitions, these figures were to be increased by an inflation-adjusted amount, based on actual costs of transition expenses and services of the most recent presidential transition.

In addition to funding provisions, the new legislation amended the PTA to require that private contributions and names of transition personnel be publicly disclosed. As a condition for receiving federal funding and services, the President-elect and Vice President-elect must formally disclose the date, source, and amount of all privately contributed funds for the transition, with a maximum contribution of $5,000 allowed from any person or organization. These written disclosures must be made to GSA within 30 days after the January 20 inauguration. The President-elect must also disclose information about transition team members before initial contact with a federal department or agency. The act also limits any temporary appointment to an executive branch vacancy to 120 days, unless a nomination has been submitted to the Senate.

Funding Under the Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act

As authorized by the act, the funding for an incoming Administration is available from the day following the general elections until 30 days after the inauguration. For the outgoing President and Vice President, transition funding was extended from six to seven months, beginning one month before the inauguration, to facilitate their relocation to private life. Separate legislation also provides former Presidents an annual lifetime pension and staff and office allowances after the transition period expires, as well as Secret Service protection.³⁵

The increase in funding under the Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act was first made available during the 1988-1989 transition of outgoing President Reagan and his successor, George H. W. Bush.

Reagan-George H. W. Bush Transition. President Reagan used $697,034 of the $1.25 million available to him under the act as the outgoing President.³⁶ Outgoing Vice President Bush was authorized $250,000 for expenses related to his transition from that office. The $250,000 was transferred to the Federal Election Commission.³⁷ Incoming President Bush and Vice President Dan Quayle spent $2.3 million of the $3.5 million authorized under the PTA, as amended, and transferred $1 million to the government of the District of Columbia for inaugural expenses.³⁸

George H. W. Bush-Clinton Transition. For the 1992-1993 presidential transition, $3.5 million was appropriated to GSA for the incoming Administration of President William Clinton and Vice President Albert Gore Jr., and $1.5 million for the outgoing Administration of President George H. W. Bush and Vice President Quayle.³⁹ Of this total, the Bush Administration determined that $1.25 million would be made available to President Bush, with the remaining $250,000 to be used by Vice President Quayle. During the transition period, President Bush used $907,939, with an unobligated balance of $342,061. Vice President Quayle used $244,192, with an unobligated balance of $5,808. President Clinton and Vice President Gore jointly spent $3,485,000, with an unobligated balance of $15,000.

For FY1997, $5.6 million was authorized in the event of a presidential transition in January 1997, which did not occur.⁴⁰

President-elect's newly appointed senior staff. In anticipation of the 2000-2001 transition, the 106th Congress enacted P.L. 106-293, the Presidential Transition Act of 2000, which President Clinton signed on October 13, 2000.⁴¹ It amended the PTA to authorize GSA to provide additional support during the 2000-2001 transition period. Most importantly, GSA was authorized to coordinate the development and presentation of orientation sessions for the President-elect's nominees for cabinet and high-level executive branch positions. Prior to the election on November 7, 2000, GSA was authorized to consult with the presidential candidates in order to begin development of a computer and communications system for use during the transition period. In conjunction with the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA), GSA was required to create a transition directory, composed of federal publications and materials pertaining to the statutory and administrative functions of each federal department and agency. A fourth major provision required the Office of Government Ethics to prepare a report on needed improvements to the financial disclosure process currently required for presidential nominees.

Clinton-George W. Bush Transition. For FY2001, GSA requested a total of $7.1 million for the 2000-2001 presidential transition. Of this total, $1.83 million was budgeted for the outgoing Clinton Administration, with $305,000 to be returned to the Treasury if Vice President Albert Gore was elected President; and $4.27 million was requested for the incoming Administration.⁴² GSA requested an additional $1 million to fund its new responsibilities under the Presidential Transition Act of 2000. On October 12, 2000, the Senate gave final approval to the conference agreement that funded this account at $7.1 million in the FY2001 Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations Act.⁴³ On October 30, President Clinton vetoed the legislation. On November 3, 2000, President Clinton signed the measure that funded the 2000-2001 transition at the requested levels.⁴⁴

Passage of the Presidential Transition Act of 2000 was intended to allow the President-elect and his appointees to "hit the ground running" as they took office on January 20, and increase their effectiveness during the crucial first year in office. However, the significance of the relatively short transition period came under intense scrutiny during the historic events surrounding the presidential election of 2000.

With less than five weeks available for formal transition activities, $1.83 million was provided to the outgoing Administration of President Clinton, which included $305,000 for Vice President Gore; $4.27 million for the incoming Administration of President-elect George W. Bush; and $1 million to provide briefings for incoming Bush appointees. According to GSA, actual FY2001 obligations for the outgoing Clinton Administration totaled $1,788,623, which included $282,935 for Vice

President Gore. Actual FY2001 obligations for the incoming Bush-Cheney Administration totaled $4,000,836 in transition costs, plus an additional $983,507 for agency briefings for incoming Bush appointees.⁴⁵

FY2005 Transition Funding

Section 6 of the PTA authorizes the President to include in his budget request for each fiscal year in which his regular term of office will expire, a proposed appropriation for carrying out the purposes of the act. In order to provide federal funding in the event of a 2004 presidential transition, the President's FY2005 budget proposal requested a total of $7.7 million. Of this total, $1 million would be provided for briefings and related transition services for incoming personnel associated with a new administration.⁴⁶

Currently, Section 3(f) of the PTA states that there shall be no expenditures of funds for the provision of services and facilities in the event the President-elect is the incumbent President, or when the Vice President-elect is the incumbent Vice President. Any funds appropriated for such purposes "shall be returned to the general funds of the Treasury." In the event no transition occurs, the President's FY2005 budget request for GSA proposed to amend the PTA through appropriation language to permit the expenditure of not more than $1 million for training and briefings for incoming appointees associated with the second term of an incumbent President.⁴⁷ No other expenditure of appropriated funds for transition purposes would be made available to the incumbent President, and the remaining $6.7 million would be returned to the general fund of the Treasury.

The House passed H.R. 5025, the FY2005 Transportation, Treasury, and Independent Agencies appropriations bill, on September 22, 2004. The legislation recommended for GSA a total of $7.7 million for the expenses associated with a possible 2004-2005 presidential transition, and included $1 million to brief incoming personnel. If no transition occurred, H.R. 5025 authorized that $1 million be used by the incumbent President for the training of new appointees associated with a second term of office. The House Committee on Appropriations also recommended the $1 million appropriation to be used by the incumbent President, and stated that the remaining $6.7 million in transition funds would be returned to the Treasury, if no transition occurred.⁴⁸ Following its passage, H.R. 5025 was received in the Senate on September 29, 2004, and placed on the Senate Legislative Calendar.

In the Senate, S. 2806, the FY2005 Transportation, Treasury, and Independent Agencies appropriations bill, also recommended a total of $7.7 million for GSA to implement a possible presidential transition, including $1 million for incoming appointees. However, the Senate Committee on Appropriations denied the request to amend the PTA to allow $1 million for training and briefings for incoming appointees associated with the second term of an incumbent President. The committee stated that it had no objection to funding such training, but believed that “it should be properly budgeted for and requested by the appropriate agencies.”⁴⁹ On September 15, 2004, S. 2806 was reported to the Senate and placed on the Senate Legislative Calendar.

P.L. 108-309 was enacted on September 30, 2004, to provide continuing non-defense appropriations through November 20, 2004. A total of $2.5 million was authorized in the event of a presidential transition, until enactment of the FY2005 omnibus appropriations bill. Due to the outcome of the 2004 presidential election, no funds were provided in P.L. 108-447, the FY2005 Consolidated Appropriations Act.⁵⁰

FY2009 Transition Funding

The President’s FY2009 budget requests $8,520,000 in funding for the upcoming presidential transition. Of this total, $1 million is provided for briefings and related transition services for incoming personnel associated with the new administration.⁵¹

Activities of Past Presidential Transitions

Before the Eisenhower/Kennedy transition in 1961-1962 and the subsequent enactment of the Presidential Transition Act of 1963, communications between incoming and outgoing Administrations were usually limited, especially when the President and President-elect were of different political parties and had been recent campaign opponents. It was generally expected that the President-elect would remain away from Washington until Inauguration Day. Formal communications took place concerning the inaugural ceremonies and the occupancy of the White House, but with virtually no discussion of substantive issues. The incoming Administration’s new cabinet generally was not selected until shortly before Inauguration Day; therefore, meetings between incoming and outgoing cabinet members were not common.⁵²

President Harry Truman, who had been thrust into the Presidency in 1945 following President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s sudden death, helped to establish the tradition that an outgoing President should actively facilitate the transition of power to an incoming President. Following the election on November 5, 1952, President Truman sent a telegram to President-elect Dwight D. Eisenhower, inviting him to a meeting in the White House “to discuss the problems of this transition period, so that it may be made clear to all the world that this Nation is united in its struggle for freedom and peace.”⁵³ President Truman also required each of the executive branch agencies to report to him on what was being done to facilitate the transition.⁵⁴

In spite of the serious responsibilities involved, only within the past 30 years, since the enactment of the PTA, have the problems associated with the transition of power received much systematic attention.

Eisenhower-Kennedy Transition

Following his election in 1960, President Kennedy entered the White House well-briefed for his assumption of responsibility. While still a candidate, Senator Kennedy commissioned various documents on the transition process and post-election issues.⁵⁵

Numerous authors and historians credit President-elect Kennedy’s preparation for transition to office in 1960-1961 as being unprecedented in the history of presidential transitions. A 1960 review of past presidential transitions by the Congressional Quarterly reported that:

John F. Kennedy made an important innovation in American Presidential transitions through his appointment of 29 task forces which were asked to report to him on a wide variety of domestic and foreign policy problems in the period immediately preceding and following his inauguration.

... [W]hile other Presidents-elect sometimes asked individual political associates or small groups of experts to brief them on limited phases of public policy, there is no precedent for the large number of task forces, some with wide memberships, which submitted detailed policy briefings to Kennedy near the time of his inauguration.⁵⁶

Senator Kennedy’s use of task forces began soon after his July 1960 Democratic presidential nomination, when he recognized that, if elected President, he would need policy-making advice to address the critical issues that would face him immediately upon taking office. Senator Kennedy asked two of his former opponents for the Democratic presidential nomination, Governor Adlai Stevenson and Senator Stuart Symington, to head the first two task forces on foreign policy and national defense issues. Senator Kennedy, before election day, appointed five additional task forces pertaining to foreign affairs, natural resources, domestic agriculture, and the overseas food program. The creation of these task forces served to highlight his interest in diverse issues, while at the same time using the expertise of former political opponents to demonstrate their support of Senator Kennedy's candidacy.⁵⁷

All of the task force members were volunteers who received no compensation. One task force project was funded by a foundation grant of $20,000. As stated earlier, the Democratic National Committee paid $350,000 of Kennedy's administrative expenses for the transition.⁵⁸

Immediately following the election, President-elect Kennedy, with the assistance of Theodore Sorensen as counsel-designate to the President, made a detailed listing of which task forces to appoint, with a deadline for submission of a final report. By his inauguration, President Kennedy had appointed 29 task forces, equally divided between foreign and domestic policy. Of this total, 24 task forces had already submitted final reports that contained precise recommendations. According to the Congressional Quarterly, approximately one person from each task force was to be appointed to a high level position within the new Administration.⁵⁹

Washington, DC, attorney Clark Clifford was appointed to be in charge of transition period relations with the outgoing Eisenhower Administration. When notified of an upcoming January 6, 1961, meeting between President-elect Kennedy and President Eisenhower, Mr. Clifford was able to present an extensive background briefing and report to Mr. Kennedy based on the task force position papers.⁶⁰

Johnson-Nixon Transition

It was during the 1968-1969 transition that the Presidential Transition Act was first used for both incoming and outgoing Administrations. As an incumbent President not running for re-election, President Johnson became the first President to invite the presidential candidates and their staff to plan for the transition before the November election.⁶¹

Richard M. Nixon began planning for an efficient transition following his nomination at the Republican National Convention in July 1968. Franklin Lincoln, Jr., an attorney and former Defense Department official, was appointed as Mr. Nixon's representative on transition matters. Mr. Nixon made use of reports of past presidential transition efforts, and made lists of early decisions that would need to be made if he were elected to office. Following his November 1968 election, President-elect Nixon created approximately 30 task forces to prepare recommendations on issues pertaining to housing, education, tax policy, transportation, foreign aid, and job training.⁶²

By the end of November 1968, President-elect Nixon had selected his first high-level appointees who would be responsible for implementing policies for his Administration. In December 1968, he met with Republican leaders to discuss his future legislative agenda. The selection of the Nixon cabinet was a long process, in which the President-elect spent six weeks studying various alternatives.⁶³

Nixon-Ford Transition

The unprecedented series of events culminating in President Nixon's resignation from office complicated the process of transition for Vice President Ford in 1974. Transition plans were initiated by Vice President Ford's close friend and former law partner Philip Buchen, who had concluded that events might force an untimely end to the Nixon Administration. According to published sources, Mr. Buchen conducted several meetings to discuss details for the change of Administrations in the event of resignation or impeachment. Assisting in the transition planning were Nixon adviser Clay Whitehead, Governor William Scranton, Senator Robert Griffin, Representative John Byrnes, former Nixon aide Bryce Harlow, and William Whyte of U.S. Steel.

One day before his formal resignation announcement to the public on August 9, 1974, President Nixon informed Vice President Ford of his intention to resign. The same day, Mr. Ford's transition planners began preparing formal documents with policy alternatives that President Ford would have to consider immediately upon taking office. The morning of Mr. Ford's swearing-in as President, advisers met at the Ford residence to brief him on their transition documents.⁶⁴

Upon assuming the presidency, President Ford asked all members of former President Nixon's cabinet and the heads of all federal agencies to remain in his Administration for continuity and stability.⁶⁵ By December 1974, the cabinet members and numerous high-ranking aides had submitted their resignations to the President. During this period, President Ford came under criticism for the allegedly slow pace at which he had replaced Nixon appointees and selected their successors. In response, Mr. Ford stated that he had become President under sudden and difficult circumstances, without the usual time to plan a transition to power.⁶⁶

Ford-Carter Transition

Before the 1976 election, the subject of Presidential transition was not publicly discussed by the Jimmy Carter campaign, reportedly because of what one Carter aide described as “the implied presumptuousness” of such considerations.⁶⁷ However, the actual planning for a Carter Administration began after the April 27, 1976, Pennsylvania primary, which Governor Carter considered the turning point in his achieving the Democratic nomination. According to press reports, while Jack Watson was still serving as Georgia finance chairman for the Carter campaign, he began drafting a detailed transition document with timetables and work-flow charts. The transition planning took place in Atlanta, Georgia, under the auspices of the “Carter-Mondale Policy Committee,” in keeping with the low-profile approach said to be preferred by Governor Carter.⁶⁸

Members of the Carter transition staff were lawyers, academicians, and government officials recruited by Jack Watson. The staff included Harrison Wellford, a former congressional staff member; Larry Bailey, staff assistant to the U.S. Conference of Mayors; Sharleen Hirsch, an educational administrator; and Jule Sugarman, a public administrator. Staff members were assigned to task forces in the areas of community and human development, government organization, international security, economic policy, natural resources, and government regulation. The transition staff sought the advice of several persons with established expertise in transition planning, such as Clark Clifford, who worked on the Kennedy transition.⁶⁹

On November 2, 1976, President Ford lost the election to Governor Carter, and the following day offered his “complete and whole-hearted support” in the transition to a new national leadership. President-elect Carter responded that he and Vice President-elect Mondale would take full advantage of this offer of close cooperation before Inauguration Day. Mr. Ford designated presidential counselor John Marsh, Jr., as his transition liaison with Mr. Carter’s transition representative, Jack Watson.⁷⁰

On the day of his election, Mr. Carter received 50 transition papers with major policy initiatives pertaining to welfare reform, energy development and conservation, government reorganization, cabinet appointments, and budget reform.

A month after the election, Mr. Carter named his first cabinet nominees and directed his attention to the staffing of the approximately 200 top positions in his Administration.⁷¹ He also announced that he would limit his time spent in Washington during the transition because he did not wish to act as if he were already

President. Mr. Carter stated that Vice President-elect Mondale was in Washington and that “he is me as far as Washington is concerned.”⁷²

On November 22, 1976, President Ford and President-elect Carter met for an hour in the White House. The President-elect also met with the Director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), the Secretaries of Defense and Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors.

Carter-Reagan Transition

As early as April 1980, Ronald Reagan began planning for a possible presidential transition when he met with a group of defense and foreign policy advisers before the Republican convention. The advisers were asked to prepare specific policy and budget recommendations for use in the first months of a Reagan Administration to enable him to begin work immediately after the inauguration. Coordinated by William Graham, an engineer with a California defense consulting firm, the experts included former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, former President Ford, former White House chief of staff Alexander Haig, Senators John Tower and Richard Stone, Governor Bill Clements, former Cabinet member Casper Weinberger, and former Ambassador Anne Armstrong.⁷³

Following the Republican convention in July 1980, nearly 300 advisers were asked by Mr. Reagan to serve on 23 task forces to prepare reports due before Inauguration Day on economic and domestic issues.⁷⁴

Ronald Reagan was elected the 40th President of the United States on November 4, 1980. President Carter pledged in his concession speech “a very fine transition period, the best in history,” and asked the country “to unite behind the President-elect.”⁷⁵ On November 6, 1980, the President-elect named his formal transition team, a job he described as “translating campaign promises into reality.” He named his campaign director, William Casey, to be chairperson of the transition executive committee, and campaign co-chairperson Anne Armstrong as vice chairperson. A personnel office was established under the leadership of E. Pendleton James to select people to fill approximately 2,700 top-level federal jobs.⁷⁶

In November 1980, President-elect Reagan announced an executive branch transition organization consisting of five working groups responsible for the transfer of power. Under the direction of William Timmons, deputy director of transition, the working units coordinated transition efforts of various cabinet departments and other executive agencies. Each cabinet department was assigned a specific team leader to oversee the transition. Mr. Reagan also named a 14-member Economic Policy Coordinating Committee that included many high ranking officials from the Nixon and Ford Administrations.

President-elect Reagan said publicly that he did not intend to preempt the powers that belonged to President Carter until Inauguration Day 1981.⁷⁷ Mr. Carter's transition representative, Jack Watson, informed the Reagan group that the outgoing President intended to defer major policy decisions for the incoming Administration.⁷⁸ President-elect Reagan and his wife met with President Carter and his wife late in November 1980.

Reagan-George H. W. Bush Transition

On November 8, 1988, George H. W. Bush became the 41st President, the first incumbent Vice President to be elected since Martin Van Buren in 1836. The following day, President-elect Bush announced the appointment of Craig Fuller, his former chief of staff, and Robert Teeter, his campaign strategist, as co-directors of the Bush transition effort. In addition, he named his longtime friend James Baker as an adviser on "key aspects" of the transition, and announced his intention to nominate Mr. Baker for Secretary of State. Mr. Bush stated that he wanted a "somewhat leaner" transition organization than was used in 1980. He also indicated that he would not seek to preempt President Reagan's authority during the transition period or "unduly influence decisions that are properly the President's."⁷⁹

In mid-November 1988, President-elect Bush's transition office opened in Washington, DC. Soon after, the Heritage Foundation delivered 2,500 resumes of persons recommended for jobs in the Bush Administration.⁸⁰ Mr. Bush proposed additional cabinet appointments on November 21, 1988, which included two from President Reagan's cabinet, Attorney General Richard Thornburgh and Education Secretary Lauro Cavazos.⁸¹

The smooth transition between the Reagan and Bush Administrations was further demonstrated on November 22, 1988, when White House Chief of Staff Kenneth Duberstein requested cabinet members and agency heads to provide information to the transition team on organizational matters, goals, and functions, resource descriptions, congressional oversight committees, regulatory programs, and other important issues relevant to each agency.⁸² By the end of November 1988, most of the executive branch agencies had designated internal transition leaders to assist in an orderly transition with President-elect Bush's transition liaisons. Mr. Duberstein stated that the transition effort greatly benefited from the eight-year partnership of President Reagan and President-elect Bush, and that "their philosophical compatibility cannot be underrated."⁸³

George H. W. Bush-Clinton Transition

Following the August 1992 nomination of William Clinton at the Democratic National Convention, several of his closest aides began working on a transition document to prepare for a possible change of Administrations following the November election. Headed by Clinton campaign manager Mickey Kantor, the working group was known as the Clinton-Gore Pre-Transition Planning Foundation, and included former Mayor Henry Cisneros, attorney Warren Christopher, former Governor Madeleine Kunin, and attorney Vernon Jordan. Governor Clinton's pre-transition team was headquartered in Little Rock, Arkansas. The team collected information on past presidential transitions and prepared a series of transition briefing books dealing with policy issues and proposed presidential agendas.⁸⁴

In his concession speech following the election on November 3, 1992, President Bush stated that "our entire administration will work closely with his [Clinton's] team to ensure the smooth transition of power."⁸⁵ At a November 5 cabinet meeting, President Bush stated that his top aides would cooperate with the Clinton transition team:

It's very important that we not be begrudging during the transition.... Let us all finish the job with the same class with which we served.⁸⁶

It was later announced that Department of Transportation Secretary Andrew Card Jr. would head President Bush's transition team. In a radio address, President Bush stated that he would return to Texas after the inauguration, where he intended to retire from politics, and to "rededicate" himself to helping others.⁸⁷

President-elect Clinton remained in Little Rock following the election, to read transition reports and to meet with top advisers. His key transition appointments were not immediately announced, and press reports indicated that there was a dispute among his aides over who should lead the Clinton transition effort.⁸⁸ On November 6, 1992, it was announced that Vernon Jordan and Warren Christopher would head the Clinton transition team. It was also reported that Mr. Clinton would choose his cabinet officers in an orderly process, and that a “stringent set of ethics rules” would be used in the selection process.⁸⁹

Clinton-George W. Bush Transition

As a result of the ballot challenges concerning the November 7, 2000, presidential election, White House Chief of Staff John Podesta issued a November 13, 2000, memorandum to executive branch agencies stating that, “because of the uncertainty over election results, no President-elect has been identified to receive federal funds and assistance under the Presidential Transition Act of 1963.”⁹⁰ The memo advised executive branch officials to provide any assistance that was “typically” provided to presidential candidates. Following the certification of the Florida popular vote on November 26, 2000, by the Florida Secretary of State in favor of Governor George W. Bush, GSA Administrator David J. Barram announced the following day that he would not authorize the release of federal transition funds since the final outcome remained “unclear and un-apparent,”⁹¹ due to ongoing legal challenges to the Florida certification. Since the PTA provides no explicit criteria for determining the “apparent successful candidates,” the GSA administrator based his decision on the 1963 legislative history, which stated that, “in a close contest, the Administrator simply would not make the decision.”⁹² Also at issue was the use of 90,000 square feet of office space in Washington, DC, that GSA had leased in anticipation of the transition period between election day on November 7 and the presidential inauguration on January 20, 2001, at a cost of approximately $700,000.⁹³

In response to GSA’s decision to withhold funding and office space, Governor Bush announced the establishment of his transition offices in McLean, VA, to be headed by the vice presidential candidate, former Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney. In a November 27, 2000, news conference, Cheney stated that the Bush-

On December 4, 2000, oversight hearings on the presidential transition were held before the House Government Reform Subcommittee on Government Management, Information, and Technology. In his opening statement, subcommittee chairman Stephen Horn expressed concern that, in spite of long-standing congressional intent to federally fund presidential transitions, “today — nearly four weeks after the presidential election — the administrator says he is still unable to ascertain a winner and, thus, is not providing the appropriate assistance required by the Presidential Transition Act.”⁹⁵ In a written statement for the hearings record, Comptroller General David M. Walter wrote that, “given the current extraordinary circumstances surrounding the election, Congress should consider extending the existing time limitation on the obligation of funds under the Transition Act to help mitigate the unforeseen delay in the initial release of public funds.”⁹⁶ As a result of these hearings, H.R. 5643 was introduced in the House on December 6, 2000, to clarify the definition of “apparent successful candidates” to permit the GSA administrator to provide transition funding and services to the President-elect and Vice President-elect as determined by official state certifications. The legislation was referred to the House Committee on Government Reform. There was no additional action in the 106th Congress.

Immediately following Vice President Albert Gore’s concession speech on December 13, 2000, GSA Administrator David Barram authorized President-elect George Bush’s use of federal transition funds and office space.⁹⁷ The following day, GSA Deputy Administrator Thurman Davis presented Vice President-elect Cheney with an electronic card that served as the key to the Washington, DC, transition office, located at 1800 G Street, NW. The Bush-Cheney transition officials assigned to coordinate with congressional staff and prospective Cabinet members were the first to relocate from their McLean, VA, headquarters to the GSA office space.

Shortly after President-elect Bush’s first formal address to the nation on December 13, he received a congratulatory call from President Bill Clinton. The following day, President-elect Bush announced plans to travel to Washington, DC, on December 18, to conduct separate visits with President Clinton and Vice President Gore, as well as to conduct interviews with possible Cabinet members.⁹⁸

With less than five weeks until his inauguration, President-elect Bush made his Cabinet selections in just 20 days. According to newspaper accounts, the President-elect and his aides used the five weeks of the election dispute to narrow their list of possible appointments, even though they were criticized by some for “presumptuously” proceeding with the transition. With so little time left before he took office, President-elect Bush narrowed his selections to nominees who had previously been through Senate confirmations in the past, selecting Donald Rumsfeld for Secretary of Defense, Colin Powell for Secretary of State, and Norman Mineta for Secretary of Transportation. In addition to their government and corporate expertise, the Cabinet nominees also had long-standing professional associations with the President-elect and his family.⁹⁹

General Considerations

Each presidential transition is unique and brings with it the conditions and circumstances facing a particular President-elect that will help shape and influence his Administration. Despite the influence of unique circumstances, observers have identified a number of generally important transition issues based on past transition experiences.

Adequate Funding. Since enactment of the Presidential Transition Act of 1963, Presidents-elect have assembled extensive staffs and organizations to conduct their transitions. In the past, discussions of presidential transitions have often focused on the importance of adequate federal funding, culminating with the Reagan transition, when $1.25 million in private funds was raised by the Reagan Transition Foundation to meet additional transition expenses. Enactment of the Presidential Transitions Effectiveness Act in 1988 recognized this issue by increasing the total amount authorized for a presidential transition to $5 million. The legislation also authorized future transition funding to be increased by an inflation adjusted amount. For the 2000–2001 presidential transition, a total of $7.1 million was appropriated for both the incoming and outgoing Administrations, and included $1 million for GSA to implement its new transition responsibilities under the Presidential Transition Act of 2000.¹⁰⁰

Pre-election Planning. The adequacy of federal funding, while a major consideration, is but one factor involved in determining the success of a presidential transition. A review of the literature on presidential transitions indicates that another major concern pertains to time, or a lack of it, in completing everything that needs to be accomplished by a President-elect in the 11-week period between an election and an inauguration. A transition period that begins swiftly and smoothly can help to determine how successful a presidency will be. The expression “to hit the ground running” is frequently used to describe the goal of past transition teams to make their imprint quickly on a new presidential agenda.¹⁰¹

During its consideration of the Presidential Transition Effectiveness Act, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs reported that there was:

... near-unanimous agreement among past transition officials that a President-elect must undertake at least some advance planning during the general election campaign. A President-elect cannot wait until the morning after the election to start planning for the transition. In order for the President-elect to “hit the ground running,” the candidate must lay the administrative groundwork before the campaign is over.¹⁰²

Based on hearing testimony by representatives of the Harvard University Public/Private Careers Project, the committee found that such “pre-election transition planning may now be essential for ensuring post-election success.”¹⁰³

A decade later, the 106th Congress enacted the Presidential Transition Act of 2000, to authorize a formal orientation process between incoming political appointees and career federal employees. A July 18, 2000, report prepared by the Senate on Governmental Affairs Committee stated that “timely orientations to new appointees” were “virtually non-existent” during past transition periods. According to the committee, enactment of the new legislation was essential to avoid “missteps and outright errors made by newly appointed officials at executive branch agencies and in the White House.”¹⁰⁴

Organizational Decisions

The day after the election, a President-elect and his staff normally must “shift gears” from winning the election to planning a successful transition. According to a 2000 Heritage Foundation project on the presidency, one of the most difficult tasks facing an incoming President is the merging of the campaign staffs and the newly-formed transition teams.¹⁰⁵ Elated by a winning campaign and a mandate for change by the electorate, a President-elect faces the transition period with great expectations. During the transition, the new Administration must act on campaign promises and quickly develop an administrative and legislative program. Author John Burke writes that the incoming Reagan Administration emphasized coordination between the transition team and the campaign staff to deflect the “rivalries and tensions” that had reportedly occurred during the previous transition of incoming President Carter.¹⁰⁶

Crucial organizational decisions must be made as soon as possible on issues that will ultimately affect how well the new Administration succeeds. The President-elect and his staff must first make decisions related to key personnel appointments, and establish liaison with the representatives of the federal departments and agencies to ensure a smooth transition. Management and organizational issues should be resolved during the transition, so that substantive policy matters can be addressed on inauguration day.¹⁰⁷

Incoming President George Bush, for example, had an obvious advantage during his well-organized 1988 transition, in that he was taking office as an incumbent Vice President. The day after his election, he immediately announced his transition team and several key staff appointments. His transition clearly benefited from the “good auspices” of former President Reagan because advice and information were “quickly conveyed, giving members of the transition both an easy start and a head start.” In addition, President-elect Bush was able to select quickly his cabinet and executive appointees from many experienced executive branch officials.¹⁰⁸

In a 1988 report on the Presidency and transitions, the National Academy of Public Administration stated that:

The initial decisions that a president makes when organizing the White House, determining its structure and functional responsibilities, and establishing patterns of interaction between it and other executive branch agencies will affect how these needs are met, and ultimately, how well a presidency works. Naturally, this will affect the achievement of policy objectives.¹⁰⁹

Continuity of the Federal Government

A leadership void can occur during the transition period when the outgoing Administration has constitutional authority but diminished influence, and the President-elect has much influence but no authority. This is sometimes referred to as a “lame duck” Administration. A 1990 University of Virginia conference on presidential transitions found that, while the incumbent Administration was often intent on having a continued impact on public and foreign policy, “the mere existence of a president-elect and his developing Administration interferes with this effort.”¹¹⁰ A 1988 report by Editorial Research Reports discussed the “dangers associated with presidential transitions,” both domestically and internationally, during the transition period. After the inauguration, difficult situations can also arise when a new and untested administration faces a sudden crisis or emergency.¹¹¹

The day following his election, President-elect Clinton made a statement, asking foreign governments to continue recognizing President Bush as the “sole voice of U.S. policy.” He also warned that “the greatest mistake any adversary could make would be to doubt America’s resolve during this period of transition.”¹¹²

Ideally, a President-elect who has been adequately briefed on policy issues by his transition teams during the weeks following the election will be better prepared to make crucial decisions upon entering office:

Continuity of the federal government and responsiveness to the new political leadership are hallmark objectives of the traditional transition process. While incorporating these objectives, the extended transition process has been refined to perform the functions of policy making, advice-giving and personnel selection simultaneously. The new administration must concentrate upon policy programs that are immediately relevant to show effectiveness on and immediately following January 20.¹¹³

Setting Priorities in the New Administration

A President-elect has 11 weeks to become informed in detail about the operations of the federal government before his inauguration on January 20. The “mechanics” of managing a transition — the tasks, deadlines, personnel decisions, budget and administrative procedures — generally occupy the initial phase of the transition process.¹¹⁴

However, the President-elect must also begin to focus on making substantive decisions on policy issues. Campaign promises are reviewed to form a policy agenda. Soon after taking office, the new President must prepare a legislative agenda to present to Congress.

The importance of the transition process cannot be underestimated in determining the ultimate success of an Administration. At least two authors advocate an “extended” transition that begins several months before the election and extends through at least the first session of Congress. If a President-elect has successfully focused on a “short list” of priorities or objectives that he wants to accomplish, he can dominate policymaking to achieve his goals during the honeymoon period that normally follows a election. By concentrating on a few key issues soon after taking office, many observers believe the President-elect can establish a public perception that he is in command of an aggressive policy agenda.
