Summary

The party ratio in the Senate standing committees is the proportional number of members of each party caucus assigned to each committee. Determining committee sizes, ratios, and assignments are among the first actions taken after a general election and at the beginning of a Congress.

The standing rules of the Senate are silent on the subject of committee party ratios. Senate Rule XXV provides for committee sizes, as well as restrictions on the number of certain types of committees on which Senators may serve. The apportionment of committee seats results from discussions between majority and minority party leadership. In general, it has been the practice of the Senate to apportion committee seats to the majority and minority parties in a manner that corresponds closely to the party strength in the full chamber. Findings from this study indicate that the majority party ratios on committees roughly approximate the majority party strength in the Senate chamber, regardless of which party has been in control.

This report shows Senate committee party ratios for 20 Congresses, covering the period of the 98th Congress (1983-1985) through March 2021, the first part of the 117th Congress (2021-2023).

Table 1 shows a comparison of majority party strength in the Senate chamber with total majority committee seats for the 98th Congress through the beginning of the 117th Congress. Unfilled seats on committees (if so noted in the Secretary of the Senate's lists or the Congressional Directory) are counted in individual and overall committee totals for consistency.

Tables 2-21 show the following for each of the 20 Congresses examined, by majority, minority, and Independents (where present):

- Senate party breakdown and majority margin;
- total committee seats, majority and minority committee seats, and majority margin;
- the standing and select committees (with legislative jurisdiction) as established and named in each Congress;
- committee seats allocated to the majority and minority parties, including Independents (where present), for each committee; and
- majority-minority seat margin for each committee.

The committee ratios data for the 99th through 116th Congresses are taken from the official committee lists for each Congress issued by the Secretary of the Senate; the Congressional Directory is the source for the 98th Congress. Data for the 117th Congress were taken from the Senate website. The earliest editions of these primary documents are generally the sources for the data, although anomalies in some Congresses, such as a delay in seating a Senator due to a contested election, sometimes necessitated using later versions of the publications. Party strength in each Congress reflects numbers found in the Secretary's lists and the Congressional Directory. Different versions of the Secretary's list and the Congressional Directory, or the use of alternate sources or methodologies, could yield different results.

Introduction

The party ratio in the Senate standing committees is the proportional number of members of each party caucus assigned to each committee. Determining sizes, ratios, and committee assignments are among the first actions taken after a general election and at the beginning of a Congress.

The standing rules of the Senate are silent on the subject of committee party ratios; the apportionment of committee seats results from discussions beginning in the early organization period between majority and minority party leadership.¹ In general, the result of these discussions has been to apportion total committee seats to the majority and minority parties in a manner that corresponds to the party strength in the full chamber. A finding of this report indicates that the majority party ratios on committees roughly approximate the majority party strength in the Senate chamber, regardless of which party has been in control.

This report shows Senate committee party ratios for 20 Congresses, covering the period of the 98th Congress (1983-1985) through the beginning of the 117th Congress (2021-2023). In addition to the standing committees, data on permanent select committees with legislative jurisdiction are also included. An additional table (Table 1) provides a comparison of majority party strength in the Senate chamber and total committee seats.

Sources and Method

The data presented in this report are drawn from the official committee assignment lists issued by the Secretary of the Senate, after assignments were made in each Congress.² Data for the 107th Congress reflect committee ratios established after the Senate reorganization in June 2001 as a result of the end of a power-sharing agreement.³ For the 99th through 116th Congresses, data on overall party strength in the Senate for each Congress were taken from the same lists,⁴ and data for the 117th Congress were taken from the Senate website.⁵ Overall party strength data for the

¹ Committee sizes appear in Senate Rule XXV, but party leaders regularly negotiate other committee sizes as well as party ratios.

² Data are generally taken from the first official list prepared as a Senate publication, excluding lists marked “interim” or “preliminary,” which may be incomplete, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate. There were some anomalies during the period examined in this report. For example, most of the lists were issued in the spring of the first session of each Congress. In the 99th Congress, all the Secretary’s lists were marked preliminary for the entire Congress. The dates of the publications are footnoted for each table. As will be noted, the 107th Congress was an exception due to the unusual circumstances of the equally divided Senate (see footnote 3). The 111th Congress was also an exception due to a contested election, which resulted in delaying for months the seating of one Senator.

³ At the beginning of the 107th Congress, the Senate was divided equally between Republicans and Democrats. As a result, Democrats chaired all committees for the first 17 days of the session, and Republicans assumed the committee chairmanships following the inauguration of Vice President Richard Cheney. A power-sharing agreement, S.Res. 8, was presented by party leaders and agreed to on January 5, 2001. In June 2001, after one Republican announced his intention to become an Independent, and switch party caucuses, the Republicans were reduced to 49 seats and the Democrats, with 50 seats, gained control of the Senate. A provision of S.Res. 120, agreed to on June 29, 2001, gave the majority a one-seat advantage on each Senate committee (except for the Ethics Committee). The resolution further provided that no Senator would lose a committee seat by virtue of the resolution. For more details, see CRS Report RL30881, Senate Organization in the 107th Congress: Agreements Reached in a Closely Divided Senate.

⁴ Party division data cited in the Secretary’s committees list may differ with party data published immediately following the November elections.

98th Congress were taken from the Congressional Directory. The data in this report are from the earliest available complete information of each Congress contained in these resources.⁶

Table 1 shows a comparison of majority party strength in the Senate chamber with total majority committee seats for the 98th Congress (1983-1985) through the 117th Congress (2021-2023). Unfilled seats on committees (if so noted in the source material) are counted in individual and overall committee totals for consistency.

Tables 2-21 show the following for each of the 20 Congresses examined, by majority, minority, and Independents (where present):

- Senate party breakdown and majority margin;
- total committee seats, majority and minority committee seats, and majority margin;
- the standing and select committees (with legislative jurisdiction) as established and named in each Congress;
- committee seats allocated to the majority and minority parties, including Independents (where present), for each committee; and
- majority-minority seat margin for each committee.

⁶ Anomalies and caveats are appropriately noted in table footnotes. Use of other versions of the primary documents, and the use of alternate sources or methodologies, may yield different results. For example, data from other sources or time frames reflecting the number of Senators representing a particular party may change during a Congress, due to the death or resignation of a Senator, or as a consequence of a Senator changing party affiliation, and could yield another result.

Data in this table include Independents who caucused with the majority or minority party, as noted in the tables corresponding with each Congress. The second-to-last column presents the percentage of total committee seats for the majority conference.

Notes: This table reflects data compiled after S.Res. 120, agreed to on June 29, 2001, gave the majority a one-seat advantage on every committee of the Senate (except for Ethics) and provided that no Senator would lose a committee seat by virtue of the resolution. At the beginning of the 107th Congress, the Senate was divided equally between Republicans and Democrats. Democrats chaired all committees for the first 17 days of the session, and Republicans assumed the committee chairmanships following the inauguration of Vice President Richard Cheney, whose ability to break tie votes made it possible for Republicans to organize the Senate. S.Res. 8, a power-sharing agreement, was agreed to on January 5, 2001. Senator James M. Jeffords changed party affiliation from Republican to Independent and caucused with Democrats effective June 6, 2001; Republicans then held 49 seats and the Democrats, with 50 seats, gained control of the Senate.

The Special Committee on Aging was the only other Senate committee to exist in the 107th Congress (exclusive of Senate assignments to joint committees). It has existed as a permanent committee since 1977. In the 107th Congress, it had a total of 21 committee members (11 Democrats and 10 Republicans).
